

Spotted deer often share lookout duties with monkeys. That suits both parties. But at the water hole, it's different. They're not every monkeys are friend. Long cam reveals that macaques actually chased deer away. Even the biggest stags retreat. With the deer having taken fright, the macaques have to rely on their own surveillance skills. A tiger spells danger. Two tigers are clearly a terrifying sight. And five macaques are always a nightmare. The spotted deer hear the commotion. But the tiger is not a particular they've perturbed. This old tick-futtered team is with life. If she keeps moving, she'll get lots more chances. Here they're a pented to choose from. She's got one. Tigers are generally said to succeed just one time out of ten, but this tiger's kills on average every third try. She needs to be good. Her cubs are already got huge appetites, and by the time they leave her, they will weigh eight times as much. Even at this size each cubs consumes around two kilos of meat at a single sitting.
